Transformations in food systems and agrifood value chains: How do work and employment come into play?

December 1st 2022. 1 pm - 4 pm CET (UTC +1)

The transformations in agri-food value chains and food systems, both in the North and in the South and in their North/South articulation, impact and question the dynamics of work and employment in agriculture and throughout the chain. Research on food systems and value chains addresses labor and employment issues in different ways. From a global perspective, it is mainly related to social standards and decent work. From a local perspective, other labor and employment issues are raised.

IAWA invites you to share current knowledge and research on following key question: how do strategies and mechanisms for transforming value chains and food systems address different labor and employment issues.

IAWA Webinar Program

- Introduction “Transformations in food systems and agrifood value chains: How do work and employment come into play? B. Dedieu IAWA
- Work and employment within the transformations in value chains and food systems: what has research told us so far? P. Malanski & S. Schiavi (UE Maringa, Brazil)
- Work and jobs in alternative food networks. The case of short food chains in North America. S. Azima & P. Mundler (Laval University, Canada)
- The adoption of a skills ecosystem approach to transition South Africa’s food system to one which is just and resilient. N. Jenkin (Pinpoint Sustainability South Africa)
- Fairer Trade and Decent Work in Agrifood Value Chains: standards, rights and gender. S. Barientos (Univ. of Manchester, UK)
- Discussion with participants. What research agenda (150 registered)
